Or a decent bat-off-ball. Does your stance really matter in a park where it's all low and slow? Beside that, do you really want to use a bat off-ball? If you were taught right, you shouldn't have to put it in the ground at all. A 2nd-3rd pitch is not going to be high (if it even gets there) and it's going to be breaking. If you want to actually start using a bat-off-ball it's time to teach yourself to hit. I teach bat-off-ball at my house all the time. A player can foul off pitches with a good bat off the ball by being in a good-enough stance, so there's that. I don't see how not wanting to swing at pitches in the middle of the plate equates to not wanting to swing at pitches out of the strike zone. There are a lot of things that go into hitting, and if you've been taught bad habits, it's going to take some work to break them. This is where the kid needs to learn to improve at a young age. If he's going to start seeing 2-3 swings in a single at bat, he's going to learn to follow through, and lose control of his wrists. He'll learn to have a follow-through, and a bunch of muscle memory will form in his swing and bat. Once he starts missing bats because of this muscle memory, he's going to struggle at the plate and get a lot of ugly swings, but if he does it every now and then, he'll get lucky and connect. The problem with most coaching is that they throw the kid something to hit, and don't teach him how to improve or work on his mechanics.You

Then, open the project in Visual Studio 2008, select the ActiveX control project (named Application.ocx), open the Project Properties page (Debug tab), click Browse button and select the release archive file. Build the project, make sure that the Application.ocx is located on the client machine, open it and drag-and-drop the Application.ocx to the web browser control. This control can be configured in any way you want: you can add menus, buttons and commandbars, you can change its position, its size or even its color. You can also change the OnLoad event handler.
