Over 1,000 motorcars ranging from classic classics to the latest concepts will be on show, with a total of 5,000 people from the industry and public attending. A key part of the event is the opportunity to test drive the cars and motorcycles on public roads, with hundreds of public access passes on offer to make the most of the event. There'll also be a special tribute to the 100th anniversary of the first internal combustion engine, which is going to be laid up in a specially erected monument at the Brussels Motor Show – a giant motorbike engine with 80 tonnes of steel and a steel stamping press that weighs 8 tonnes, using 10 tonnes of steel.Q: Python: Check for undefined I found this solution to check whether a variable has defined using `var1 = None` print "var1", var1 It works well. However, what if var1 had some value? The printed value would print 'None'. I found that the proper way is `var1 = 0` print "var1", var1 I'm curious: Is there any built-in way to do this? What's the difference between None and the value 0? A: Yes, there is an in built method to do this: `if x: # Do something` However, this is not better than the `if x == None` statement you already found. `if x: # Do something` Here's an explanation by PEP 8 (Python Style Guide) Q: Which computer to get for boot camp/compatibility testing (2010+ imac g5)? Okay. So I've searched the question and couldn't find this answer. I have an imac g5, and I'm looking to buy another computer to test my application on. I'm specifically looking for a MacBook Pro or MacBook Air. The main requirement is to have a retina screen (maximum 4k@60fps
